ABOUT THE AREA

Lessac is a commune in the Charente department in southwestern France. About three kilometers north of the town center is the Domaine de Boisbuchet with the Château de Boisbuchet, built in 1865 on a hill above the Vienne.

Charente is a department in the administrative region of Nouvelle-Aquitaine, south western France. It is named after the river Charente, the most important and longest river in the department, and also the river beside which the department's two largest towns, Angoulême and Cognac, are sited.

Charente is a thriving department due to several economic sectors. Cognac production is one of the incomes of Charente. It is exported at about 95%, France's consumption being only of 5%. The famous brandy represents 45% of the agriculture economic resource of the department. Cognac also allowed Charente to develop other dynamic industries such as cardboard packaging, tags, transport, cooperage and distillation equipment. Papermaking industry has been for a long time a flagship sector in Charente.

The department houses many typical towns. In the south east, an international festival welcomes each year hundreds of visitors. It takes place in Angoulême and deals with comic trips. This is a worldwide meeting not to be missed. On the way, you can also visit the beautiful town centre and nature areas.

Finally, any one should be seduced by the charming Charente valley and River. The Charente is sometimes nicknamed 'happy river'. In some places, it forms small wonderful isles. Several paths allow both hikers and bikers to discover this area of the department. Woods, lakes and streams are also part of this amazing setting!
