ABOUT THE AREA

Llurimagua is a remote community and a significant mining concession located in the Intag Valley within the Imbabura Province of northwestern Ecuador. Nestled in the western foothills of the Andes, the area is renowned for its stunning but fragile primary cloud forests, which are part of the Tropical Andes—the world's most biodiverse 'hotspot.' This region is a sanctuary for dozens of endangered species, including the brown-headed spider monkey, spectacled bears, and the Longnose Harlequin frog, which was once thought to be extinct before its rediscovery in these very forests.

The area is primarily famous for the Llurimagua copper-molybdenum project, a massive mineral deposit that has been at the center of a decades-long struggle between state interests and local defenders of nature. For over 30 years, local communities have resisted large-scale mining to protect their water sources and traditional ways of life, which include sustainable agriculture and community-led tourism. This resistance led to a landmark legal victory in March 2023, when an Ecuadorian court revoked the project's environmental license, citing violations of the 'Rights of Nature' and the lack of prior consultation with the inhabitants.

Despite the legal setbacks and the withdrawal of the Chilean state miner Codelco in 2024, the Ecuadorian government remains interested in the project's potential. As of early 2026, plans have been announced to launch a new international tender for the concession, estimated to be worth billions of dollars. This continues to make Llurimagua a focal point for global discussions on 'green' mineral extraction versus the preservation of irreplaceable ecosystems, as the world's demand for copper increases for the energy transition.

For travelers or officials visiting the region, the nearest major international hub is Mariscal Sucre International Airport (UIO) in Quito. Located approximately 80 kilometers (about 50 miles) to the south, the airport is roughly a three-hour drive from the Intag Valley due to the winding mountain roads. While the journey into Llurimagua offers spectacular views of the Andean highlands, the rugged terrain emphasizes just how secluded and pristine this corner of Ecuador remains.
