ABOUT THE AREA

Gibraltar is situated at the southern tip of the Iberian Peninsula. It is recognised historically as the southernmost point of Europe and is also strategically positioned at the western end of the Mediterranean, forming one of the ancient Pillars of Hercules. The nearby countries are Spain to the north and Morocco (North Africa) to the south, on the other side of the strait 24 kilometres (15 miles) away. The Rock is mainly Jurassic Limestone some 200 million years old.

In terms of style, Gibraltar – a three-mile-long headland on Spain's south coast – is dressed up like a seaside town you'd find in Blighty. Its buzzing town centre's dotted with waterfront hotels, red post boxes, and plenty of fish-and-chip shops. Main Street, meanwhile, is a quintessential British high street – expect rows of handsome shops selling VAT-free perfume, jewellery, and souvenirs.

Wartime tunnels

Gibraltar's main star – the 420-metre-tall Rock of Gibraltar – has been used as a defensive fort by Britain since the Napoleonic Wars, in the early 1800s. At the time, British soldiers dug miles of maze-like underground tunnels, to protect themselves from incoming cannon fire. These were later expanded during the Second World War – bringing the total distance to over 34 miles – and they're now one of Gibraltar's must-see attractions.

Spanish-style shorelines

Just like mainland Spain, Gibraltar's beaches are top class. You'll find the territory's main belts on the east coast, where their sands gently shelve into the Mediterranean Sea. A couple of the headliners include Catalan Bay – a fishing-boat-scattered beach that's backed by a row of pastel-painted houses – and Sandy Bay. The latter has pond-still water, courtesy of a coastal rock wall that protects the area from the open sea.
