ABOUT THE AREA

Ngararatunua, also spelled Ngāraratunua, is a serene semi-rural community nestled on the fringes of Whangārei, a city in New Zealand's Northland Region on the North Island. Its location places it within a historically rich area of the country, often considered the birthplace of the nation due to its proximity to significant historical events. The community offers a peaceful, country environment with a rural outlook, yet remains conveniently close to city amenities. For instance, the popular Kamo Village is just a short drive away, and the Whangārei Town Basin, with its waterfront dining and attractions like the Hundertwasser Art Centre, is also easily accessible.

The heart of Ngararatunua is the Ngāraratunua Marae, a cherished Māori cultural venue and a central meeting place for several hapū (sub-tribes) of the larger Ngāpuhi iwi (tribe). These include Ngāti Hau, Ngāti Hine, Te Parawhau, and Ngāti Kahu o Torongare. The marae is a living embodiment of Māori heritage, where the meeting house (wharenuī) is a beautifully crafted structure that tells the stories of ancestors and lineage. It is a space for cultural events and community gatherings, upholding the values of manaakitanga (hospitality) and operating under traditional tikanga (protocols).

An important historical feature of the marae is the Te Paea Soldiers' Memorial Hall, which serves as the wharenuī (meeting house). It was officially opened in 1954 and is named in honor of Te Paea Cherrington (d. 1937), an influential tribal leader and dedicated member of the Mothers' Union. This memorial hall signifies the community's deep-rooted traditions and its connection to both tribal history and New Zealand's national history, serving as a focal point for the local Māori community to connect and honour their heritage.

For travelers, the closest and most convenient airport to Ngararatunua is Whangārei Airport (WRE). This regional airport is situated approximately 4 nautical miles southeast of Whangārei city, in the suburb of Onerahi, and serves as the primary air gateway to the Northland region. Whangārei Airport offers scheduled flights, most commonly connecting to Auckland, making Ngararatunua a relatively accessible destination for both domestic visitors and international travelers flying into New Zealand's major hubs.
