About the Area

Souskiou and Arsos represent two distinct chapters of Cypriot history, offering a deep look into the island's cultural evolution and heritage. While Arsos is a thriving mountain village in the Limassol District, Souskiou is a hauntingly beautiful abandoned settlement in the Paphos District. Both are situated in regions defined by rugged landscapes and traditional stone architecture, yet they provide very different experiences for travelers seeking to understand the 'real' Cyprus.

Arsos is one of the most significant 'Krasochoria' (Wine Villages) in the Limassol District, perched at an altitude of 850 meters on the slopes of Laona Mountain. Its history is deeply rooted in viticulture, with residents continuing the ancient tradition of making their own red wine and grape-based delicacies like 'palouzes' and 'shoudzioukos.' The village is famous for its picturesque cobble-stoned streets, the 13th-century church of Apostle Philip, and the 'Six Fountains' nature trail, which connects several medieval stone fountains along a lush riverside path.

In contrast, Souskiou serves as a silent monument to the island's turbulent 20th-century history. Located in the Dhiarizos Valley, it was once a bustling mixed village of Greek and Turkish Cypriots before becoming exclusively Turkish Cypriot in the 1960s. It was completely abandoned following the events of 1974. Today, its weathered stone ruins and derelict buildings stand against a dramatic backdrop of limestone cliffs and the Dhiarizos River, attracting photographers and history enthusiasts who come to witness the poignant beauty of a community frozen in time. The plot itself is located on the fringe of the Souskiou area and is closer to the villages of Choletria and Nikokleia, a short 5 minute drive to both where you can find all amenities.'

For those planning a visit to these inland gems, accessibility is key. Arsos is roughly a 45-minute drive from the coast, while Souskiou is tucked deeper into the valley north of Kouklia. The nearest major gateway for both locations is Paphos International Airport (PFO) . Arsos is approximately 40 km (45 minutes) from Paphos Airport, while Souskiou is even closer, situated about 20 km (25 minutes) away, making them both feasible as day trips from the western side of the island.
