ABOUT THE AREA

Rosarito, officially known as Playas de Rosarito, is a vibrant coastal resort city located on the Pacific coast of Baja California, Mexico. Situated just about 10 miles south of the U.S.-Mexico border, it has evolved from a sleepy suburb of Tijuana into a booming destination for travelers seeking a quick and sun-drenched escape. The city is famous for its wide sandy beaches, energetic nightlife, and rich artisan culture, making it a favorite weekend getaway for Southern Californians and international tourists alike.

The heart of Rosarito's appeal lies in its dynamic blend of outdoor adventure and culinary indulgence. Ocean lovers flock here for excellent surfing, horseback riding along the shoreline, and ATV riding through the nearby sand dunes. Food enthusiasts are equally spoiled, especially in the nearby village of Puerto Nuevo, which is world-renowned for its traditional style of serving pan-fried local lobster with hand-made flour tortillas, rice, beans, and melted butter.

Beyond the beach, the city thrives as a creative hub filled with local craftsmanship. Visitors can explore a bustling shopping district packed with open-air markets and galleries showcasing authentic Mexican folk art, wrought-iron furniture, hand-painted pottery, and custom leather goods. The town also holds a unique place in cinematic history, as its coastal studios were originally built by 20th Century Fox to film the blockbusters Titanic and Master and Commander.

Because Rosarito does not have its own commercial airport, travelers typically fly into Tijuana International Airport (TIJ), which is the closest airport located just 22 miles (35 kilometers) north of the city. From Tijuana's airport, it is an easy 30-to-45-minute drive down the scenic coastal highway to reach the resorts. Alternatively, travelers coming from the United States often fly into San Diego International Airport (SAN), which sits about 31 miles north, and cross the border using the Cross Border Xpress (CBX) pedestrian bridge directly into the Tijuana airport terminal
