ABOUT THE AREA

Kabwe, the capital of Zambia's Central Province, is a city with a significant industrial and political history. Originally named Broken Hill, the town was founded in 1902 following the discovery of substantial lead and zinc deposits, which established it as a major mining hub for several decades. Beyond its mining roots, the city holds a prominent place in the national narrative as the 'birthplace of Zambian politics,' serving as the site of key meetings in 1958 at Mulungushi Rock that eventually led to the country's independence.

The city is geographically central and serves as a vital transportation node, situated directly on the T2 Great North Road. This strategic location links the Copperbelt in the north with the national capital, Lusaka, in the south. Historically, Kabwe also functioned as the headquarters for Zambia Railways, a role that heavily influenced its development and infrastructure, even as the town transitioned from a mining-dependent economy to one more focused on agriculture and administrative services.

Environmentally, Kabwe has faced notable challenges related to its industrial legacy. Because of its history of lead and zinc extraction, the area has struggled with heavy metal contamination in its soil and water supply, earning it international attention regarding public health and environmental remediation efforts. Despite these ongoing concerns, the city remains an important urban center, home to over 280,000 people according to recent estimates.

For travelers, Kabwe does not have its own commercial airport with scheduled passenger flights. The nearest major international gateway is Kenneth Kaunda International Airport (LUN) in Lusaka, located approximately 140 kilometers to the south. While there is a local facility known as Milliken Airport (or Chililalila Airstrip) on the edge of town, it is a small public airfield not typically utilized for standard commercial air travel. Consequently, most visitors reach Kabwe via road transport, such as buses or private vehicles, traveling from Lusaka or the northern Copperbelt region.
