Praia da Rocha is a beach in the municipality of Portimão, in the Algarve (Portugal). This beach has a large extension of sand, in a total area of about 146,000 m², along 1.5 km of coastline. Next to the beach stands the Fortress of Santa Catarina, built in the seventeenth century to ensure the defense of the bar of the Arade river.

The beach owes its name to the rocks that lie between the sand and the sea. It is one of the most famous in the Algarve, if not in the whole country. Every year, during the summer, the beach fills up with tourists from all over the world and, despite its great extension, it is rare not to be crowded with people.

Also be surprised by the wide sands of the Alvor Beaches; with the most hidden small coves, cliffs and caves along the coast; with rocky beaches such as Praia do Alemão, with the animation of the most familiar beaches or with the unique beauty of Praia da Rocha.

Have fun and, with the help of this summary, choose the beach that best suits your taste and needs and discover why the beauty of the Algarve's beaches is in Portimão.

Next to the beach, there is a plurality of restaurants and bars that attracts a large number of tourists, both during the day and at night.
