The Thuringian Sea is an impressive reservoir area in the south of Thuringia and is one of the largest contiguous reservoirs in Germany. It stretches along the Saale river and mainly comprises the Bleiloch dam and the Hohenwarte dam - two huge reservoirs that are supplemented by other smaller reservoirs. The region is affectionately known as the "Thuringian Sea" due to its size and water surface.

Geography and formation

The Thuringian Sea is located in the Saale-Orla district and stretches along the upper reaches of the Saale through the densely wooded and hilly area of the Thuringian Slate Mountains. The largest dam is the Bleilochsperre, which is also the largest reservoir in Germany in terms of storage volume. It was built in the 1930s to provide flood protection, power generation and water supply. This was followed shortly afterwards by the Hohenwarte dam, slightly downstream.

Nature & leisure

Today, the Thuringian Sea is a popular vacation and recreation area that attracts nature lovers, water sports enthusiasts and hikers alike. The extensive expanses of water, the fjord-like shorelines and the dense forests offer ideal conditions for:

Sailing, canoeing and fishing

Hiking and cycling along well-maintained paths

Camping at numerous sites near the lake

Houseboat vacation - similar to the Mecklenburg Lake District

A special highlight is the Thuringian Sea Panorama Trail, which offers breathtaking views over water and forest.

Culture & sights

There are numerous small towns with history and charm around the Thuringian Sea. Points of interest are:

The dam walls themselves, impressive engineering structures

The Leuchtenburg castle near Kahla

The Saalburg town museum, which documents the history of the region and the construction of the dam Burgk Castle with exhibitions and cultural events

Significance & future

In addition to tourism, the Thuringian Sea still plays an important role in energy generation (hydroelectric power plants) and flood protection in Central Germany. At the same time, the region is increasingly being developed as a model region for sustainable tourism.
