ABOUT THE AREA

Palhoça is a municipality in Santa Catarina, southern Brazil. With a long Atlantic coastline and several islands, the state is known for its beaches and mountains. Florianópolis, the capital, has a traditional public market with bars, restaurants and food stalls, and a history museum set in a 19th-century colonial governor's palace. The city is situated mostly on Santa Catarina Island, which has beach resorts at its northern tip.

Life's a beach – at least in sunny Santa Catarina, which has 348 miles (560km) of spectacular coastline. If you like your beach deserted, there is a spot of sand for you in the south of Ilha de Santa Catarina. If you prefer a party scene, head further north on that same island. If you're all about big surf, it's up in Guarda do Embaú and Praia do Rosa, two absolutely stunning surf villages south of Florianópolis.

Sun and sand aside, the inland regions are also where Santa Catarina exhibits the profound influence of its German ancestry, most evident during Oktoberfest, Blumenau's huge festival for folk dancing, accordion playing and beer drinking – well, mostly beer drinking. But the Alpine architecture and fresh-brewed beer are here to enjoy year-round.

The island of Santa Catarina is noted throughout Brazil for its Mediterranean-like scenery, attractive fishing villages and the city of Florianópolis, the state's small and prosperous capital. The island has a subtropical climate, rarely cold in winter and with a summer heat tempered by refreshing South Atlantic breezes; the vegetation is much softer than that further north. Joined to the mainland by two suspension bridges (the longest, British-designed, has been closed for several decades to all but cyclists and pedestrians), the island is served by frequent bus services connecting it with the rest of the state, other parts of Brazil, Buenos Aires, Asunción and Santiago. During January and February, the island is extremely popular with Argentine, Uruguayan and Paraguayan tourists who can usually enjoy a summer holiday here for much less than the cost of one at home.

Although the northeast of Santa Catarina is populated by people of many ethnic origins, it's an area most associated with Germans who so obviously dominate both culturally and economically. Joinville and Blumenau vie with each other to be not only the economic powerhouse of the region, but also the cultural capital. However, both cities lose out in terms of tourist interest to the small towns and villages of the interior where old dialects are still spoken. One such community is Pomerode, which is set in a picturesque area and does much to promote its German heritage.

For scenery you can't beat a trip to Morro da Igreja near the town of Urubici or the Serra do Rio do Rastro, a corkscrew journey all the better taken by motorbike! And don't forget the wine regions of Sao Joaquim, there is something for everyone.
