ABOUT THE AREA

Manabí is a province located in the central coastal region of Ecuador, bordering the Pacific Ocean. Known for its diverse landscapes, it encompasses long stretches of beautiful beaches, fertile agricultural plains, and rolling hills. The province is named after the Manabí people, an indigenous culture that inhabited the area. Its capital city is Portoviejo, a significant commercial and administrative center. Manabí's economy is largely based on agriculture, fishing, and a growing tourism sector, drawn to its scenic coastline and cultural heritage.

The region boasts a rich cultural identity, deeply rooted in its history and traditions. Visitors can explore charming coastal towns, vibrant markets, and historical sites that showcase the local way of life. Manabí is also known for its distinctive cuisine, heavily featuring fresh seafood and locally grown produce, particularly peanuts, which are a staple in many regional dishes. The warm and humid tropical climate makes it an appealing destination year-round for those seeking sun, sea, and a relaxed pace of life.

For travelers arriving by air, the most convenient airport serving the Manabí province is the Eloy Alfaro International Airport (MEC), located near the city of Manta. Manta is a major port city and a significant economic hub within the province. This airport offers both domestic flights, connecting Manabí to other major cities in Ecuador like Quito and Guayaquil, and some international connections, making it the primary gateway for tourists and business travelers visiting the region.

While Eloy Alfaro International Airport in Manta is the closest and most practical option for accessing Manabí directly by air, travelers might also consider flying into the larger international airports in Guayaquil (GYE) or Quito (UIO). However, these airports are located further away, requiring additional travel by land (bus or car) to reach destinations within Manabí province, with journey times ranging from several hours depending on the specific location within Manabí.
